THE GAZETTE.

MONDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 1, 1858.

FROM SOUTH CAROLINA TO VIRGINIA. The following is from one of Dr. Mackay's recent "Transatlantic Sketches," published in the London Illustrated News:

"Away again through the eternal pine forests for bundreds of miles! The railway is as straight as an arrow's flight or a mathematical line; and we have to travel for thirty hours without other stoppages than an occabreakfast or dinner. The country is unpicfor the back or the head of the unhappy traveller; where there is not even a place to stow away a hat, a stick, an umbrella or a bag; and where about sixty persons of all ages and condition in life, including half a dozen young children, and at least twenty people who chew tobacco and spit, are closely packed in an atmosphere deprived of all moisture and elasticity by the red heat of an anthracite stove that glows and throbs in this lecumotive den. Behind the stove, and on the side of the car, in large lettere, is the following inscription: "Gentlemen are requested not to spit on the stove." And here, as well as at any other point of my journey, I may as well say what I have to say on the subject of the odious practice of tobacco chewing, and its concomitant and still more odious practice of spitting, so disgustingly prevalent in the Southern and Western States, and to a with interest thereon from the 24th of March, minor extent in the Northern. Before I saw with my own eyes the extent and prevalence of this filthiness I imagined that the accounts said claim. The defendant, A. L. Gregory, not of this filthiness I imagined that the accounts given by preceding travelers were exagerations and caricatures, intended to raise an ill-natured laugh; but observation speedily convinced me that all I had previously read upon the subject fell short of the truth, and that it would be difficult to exaggerate the extent of the vice, and the callousness with which it is regarded even by people of education and refinement. Americans who have traveled in Europe do not seem to be annoyed that strangers should take notice of the practice and be offended by it; but custom so dulls even their perceptions of its offensiveness that they consider the fault finders as somewhat squeamish and over sensitive .---Once at Washington, I found myself the centre of a group of members of Congress, two of whom were among the most expert and profuse spitters (I was going to write expectorators, but the word is not strong enough) whom it was ever my fortune to meet, when the conversation having turned upon the military prowess and skill of several gentlemen who had distinguished themselves in the Mexican war, I was suddenly asked by one of them-who cleared his mouth for the purpose with one of the most portentous floods of tobacco juice I ever saw-who was the greatest General in America? The reply was General Spit. "Well," said the serator, "I calculate you are about right; and though | exandria, once a week for four successive weeks, you, as a Britisher, may say so, I should and posted at the front door of the Court house Blankets; white Cambric; Check Muslin; Huckauvise you not to put the observation in-of this County. A Copy—Teste: B. H. BERRY, Clerk. to print, as some of our citizens might take it as personal." On another occasion an eminent lawyer, who had filled some of the highest offices of the State, a man to whom ancient and modern literature were equally familiar, who had studied European as well as American politics, whose mind seemed to have run through the whole circle of Luman knowledge; and who could converse elequently on any subject, though while he spoke the tobacco juice ouzed out of the corners of his mouth, and ran down upon his shirt front and waistcoat, took a large cake of tobacco from a side pocker, and courteously offered me a chew. The cake, I should think, weighed about half a pound. I asked him if he had ever calcula ted how many gallons of spit such a cake re-presented? "Well," he said, putting the cake back into his porket, "it is a disgusting habit. I quite agree with you. I have made several attempts to break myself of it but in vain. I cannot think, nor work, without a chew; and, although I know it injures my stomach, and is in other respects bad for me, I am the slave of the habit, and will, I fear, be so to the end of my days." Even in the presence of ladies, the chewers and spitters do not relent; and ladies seem almost if not quite, as indifferent to the practice as the o'her sex. In theatres and lecture-rooms are constantly to be seen inscriptions requesting gentleman not to spit in the boxes or on the stoves; and in all places of public resort the spittoon is an invariable article of furniture. Spittoons garnish the marble steps of the Capitol at Washington; spittoons are in all the reading rooms, bars, lobbies, and offices of the hotels; spittoons in every railway cor; and in the balls of every State Legislature which I visited; the Parliamentary spittoons seemed to be as indispensable as the desks and benches of the members. If the Americ .n eagle were represented as holding in his or ber claw a spittoon-instead of the thunderbolt of Jove, the change might not be graceful or poetical, but would certainly not be inappropriate. But enough on this subject, which I would gladly have omitted to met-
